

I chose, as my first critic, to talk about Moira written by Julien Green.

Joseph Day, a handsome young and pious man arrives at the University. He's always resided in the countryside, in a protestant family and arriving in the city is pretty disturbing for him because he has to live with a few students obsessed with women and going out. But Moira, a young lady used to seducing, will upset his life.

This book's been written in 1950 so everything is really different. Some normal things in this book are weird compared to our everyday life (when we're not in quarantine of course). For instance, the fact that men and women are separated and can't have a friendly relationship. This book is really easy and pleasant to read, Julien Green is a very good writer and Moira is considered as one of his best novel and a best-seller. I would recommend it at 100% because, first of all, the title is really cool but beyond that, all the story is actually great.
